

I am recent subscriber to XM Radio. I do not live in an area that has a channel of traffic and weather information yet, but I can commiserate with my fellow subscribers in the major metroplexes that are supported by this service. During my morning commute, I have to switch over to a broadcast station to try and see if I can get some information regarding the future of my day. Unfortunately, I am usually bombarded with a seemingly relentless stream of advertising, or I am forced to listen to either some unfunny hack or several songs before I can get the information that I need. I like the fact that XM Radio offers a service, for which I pay with my hard earned wages, to give the greater convenience. I find it laughable that the NAB is seeking to try and buy their way out of the competition rather than improving their service to keep their customer base happy. I hope that this letter may make some difference. Sincerely

Cliff Tercenio
